Alexis Juergens is an intellectual property litigator, regularly representing organizations in patent, trademark, trade dress, false advertising, unfair competition, copyright, and trade secret litigation throughout the United States. She has extensive experience practicing in forums throughout the United States, including litigation in front of the International Trade Commission. Alexis manages every aspect of complex intellectual property disputes from early case assessments and discovery to trial preparation and courtroom advocacy. With extensive experience in intellectual property litigation, Alexis excels in formulating effective legal strategies that are tailored to protect client's innovations as well as defend clients against any intellectual property claims brought against them. Alexis' attention to detail allows her to meticulously manage discovery, help identify key expert witnesses, take and defend depositions, and craft persuasive arguments that resonates with judges. Her experience allows her to successfully resolve cases while ensuring the resolution aligns with her clients broader business goals.

Alexis has represented and advised clients in diverse industries and technologies, including home fitness technology, robotic process automation, home automation and security, IoT, automotive, solar, and fashion and beauty. She is a member of the firm's IP Litigation Practice Group, Trademark, Copyright & Advertising Litigation Practice Group, Patent Litigation Practice Group, and Foley's Fashion, Apparel & Beauty Industry Team.

Prior to Alexis' legal career, she was a Division I swimmer, winning three conference championships in her undergraduate career.
