Hershel J. (James) Howard represents domestic and international clients in sophisticated matters involving corporate tax law, finance, and securities, primarily in the energy and real estate sectors. He also counsels wealthy individuals in matters relating to estate planning, financial planning, trust administration, and probate administration and advises business owners in a broad range of corporate law matters. He is a partner in the firm's Taxation and Estates & Trusts Practices.

With extensive experience assisting clients with the tax and corporate issues related to structuring and planning for international investments and financings, James counsels companies with global operations seeking efficient ways to repatriate profits generated overseas while navigating international tax laws. He has structured numerous partnerships and joint ventures, both in the United States and internationally.

James once served as outside general counsel for a global company advising on a wide range of issues, including numerous M&A transactions. He still works with many private equity-backed management teams, advising on tax and corporate matters. He has also represented real estate owners and developers in corporate and tax-related planning.

In the energy sector, James helps clients involved in the exploration and production, oilfield services, and chemical sectors. He also advises tax-exempt entities, such as higher education institutions, charities, and private clubs, in their operations.

Clients regard James as an experienced business advisor who knows U.S. federal tax laws. They value his practical tax advice, synthesizing the complicated principles of tax law in a manner that allows them to make informed decisions.

Since the passage of the Corporate Transparency Act in 2020, James has been closely following the Act's development and the burdens it will place on U.S. entities. James is a frequent speaker around the country on the Act.
