James Matthews handles complex business disputes for a variety of businesses, including manufacturers of pharmaceutical products and medical devices, frequently representing life sciences and technology companies in commercial disputes pending in courts and before arbitrators throughout the country. In addition to representing these businesses in litigation, he is a trusted advisor to them in connection with the litigation risks associated with their businesses.

In the past 20 years, James has acted as lead counsel to generic drug manufacturers and pharmaceutical distributors in some of the most complex and multifaceted litigations pending in courts across the United States. He has also represented these companies as both defendant and plaintiff in commercial disputes, resulting in defense verdicts and plaintiffs' verdicts and settlements collectively in excess of hundreds of millions of dollars.

Prior to joining Foley, James was a partner at another firm. He also was appointed Special Assistant District Attorney for Middlesex County for an interim period. For two years after law school, he clerked for The Honorable John E. Conway, U.S. District Judge for the District of New Mexico.

James is a member of the Commercial Litigation Practice Group and co-chair of the Pharmaceutical and Other Regulated Drugs Area of Focus within the firm's Health Care & Life Sciences Sector.

For more than twenty years, James Matthews has tried complex, high-profile cases on behalf of clients in difficult circumstances. He has appeared in state and federal courts around the country, tried cases before judges and juries for plaintiffs and defendants, and won verdicts on behalf of both. He past trials have included claims under the False Claims Act, federal and state antitrust statutes, and a variety of state unfair competition acts, as well as claims for fraud and breach of contract. In 2009, he obtained the "biggest verdict of the year" in Massachusetts in a patent infringement case. Six months later he "won" a mistrial when an Alabama jury was unable to agree that the pharmaceutical manufacturer he represented (Watson Pharmaceuticals) had defrauded the state of Alabama by submitting fake "Average Wholesale Prices" to Alabama Medicaid. Two years later, James won a unanimous defense verdict in another “AWP” case when a Kentucky jury rejected Kentucky’s identical claims against Watson. In 2015, he took a “pay-for-delay” antitrust cases to trial, representing generic pharma manufacturer Apotex Corp. against industry behemoths Cephalon, Teva, Mylan and Dr. Reddy’s and obtaining — after his closing argument — nine figures in settlements. In 2022 and 2023, James defended Andia, Inc. in two trials accusing it of fomenting and benefitting from the country’s “opioid crisis.” James honed his trial skills as a Special Assistant District Attorney in the Cambridge (Massachusetts) District Court, where he learned that attention to detail was second only to developing strong themes and delivering a clarifying narrative in the toolbox of successful trial lawyers.
